Excerpt from Blue Lights, or the Convention: A Poem, in Four Cantos A sufficient canm sidered as defects, the writer must plead precedent in excuse; for if it is defective in plot, ungrammatical in language, or improbable in incident, his celebrated namesake, so universally admired, is guilty of the same faults. He is conscious also that the late date of his subject is far from being a recommendation. The Dark tint of time which gives to a copper coin, worth by weight three-pence-halfpenny, an inestimable value, is also necessary to give value to a poem. Like fresh venison, it is of little price: but after lying in the gene: till green with age, it excites the warmest approbation user me! With delight.
