Towards the end of the First World War Russian workers revolted and struck back with their weapon of choice, that being the withdrawal of their labour, thus began The Bolshevik Revolution in October 1917. Millions of people had been dragged in to a useless war and when the women of Russia protested at the shortage of food Czar Nicholas II turned the soldiers on the people. The women protesters appealed to the army to support their cause, and in a very short period of time the Czar was deposed and a provisional government made up of bankers, lawyers, industrialists, and capitalists was formed. The Bolshevik Party in Russia were on the rise and in 1917 Vladimir Lenin returned from exile and joined the party whose goal was to overthrow the Provisional Government and set up a government for the proletariat. In the agitation that followed, Lenin encouraged the peasants to take the land from the rich landlords and the industrial workers to seize the factories from their capitalists owners. The workers began to organize themselves into workers councils or Soviets as they were known, they were elected from among their peers, unlike the provisional government. They began to educate themselves on political, economic and social issues, and so the scene was set for the people of Russia to embark on a journey of self-determination. The Russian people wanted an end to the war which was a cause of great suffering throughout Russia and beyond. The final unsuccessful push against the Germans in June 1917 broke the resolve of the troops who had remained loyal to the provisional government. The Bolsheviks, led by Lenin, encouraged mass desertion from the army and...
